The G'lith have been a spacefaring species for only a few centuries. In that time, they have expanded in their sphere as rapidly as possible. Their homeworlds are actually a double planet system (Lakar and Hesk), and explorations early in their development lead them across the gulf of space to their original homeworld's twin. G'lith are sequential hermaphrodites, changing from female to male as they become older.

The G'lith homeworlds are still ruled by an assortment of different nation-states, and most of their colonies have become breakaway republics or kingdoms, making dealing with the G'lith something of a mixed bag. It's impossible to know which group you're dealing with until you actually get down to it. Still, the G'lith have a religious obligation that affects the vast number of them; they worship a deity of technology and advancement. They love engineering problems, and are often interested in augmentations such as cybernetics and genetic enhancements (leading to their racial characteristics, as most have some basic cybernetics already.)

SWN Traits:

Lens: Faith
Language: G'lith
Focus Abilities:

- Natural Defenses (AC 15+1/2 Character level rounded up, Claws 1d8+1)
- Origin Skill: Fix

Religions:

Blurb

Major Civlization:

The G'lith Technocracy was initially the colonial administration from the various nation-states of the twin G'lith homeworlds, Lakar and Hesk. It was driven to seek out worlds for agricultural development and food production, and was founded with "political liberty" in mind (in reality, ridding Lakar and Hesk of political malcontents and dissidents). Eventually a devastated alien colony world with dangerous ruins was discovered, and it was settled and named "Akarr". The ruins are still categorized as high-security "hazard zones". The Technocratic rulers now only control their own vital interests, and most of the population is left to their own devices. The Administrator himself is an older G'lith, kept in power through wide popular support (although there is tension among the Technocratic elite over the specifics of control, and among the civilian population from the ignoring of crimes committed by the elite since cash can get charges dropped completely).

The Technocracy is a "digital" direct democracy, with individuals voting via their compads or other connected devices. Civilians themselves are poorly organized, and few resist the current Administrator's government. A strong tradition tied to the digital democracy gives the civilian population great pull, although this is being hampered by a recent uptick in the idea that a True AI could run everything more efficiently. With the approach of the Dark Elven Matriarchal Fleet, popular support is also brewing for war with the interlopers. Outsiders and aliens alike are generally welcomed, but are often ignored by the populace. Through digital democracy, honesty is greatly valued but marred by the idea that technology will fix every issue, making many civilians rather feckless.